Mediation Techniques That Can Help You

By Chaim Steinberger, Esq.

I've been a mediator since 1992, and serve on mediation panels of the New York State Baptist Church, the Southern District of New York (SNDY), the Mediation and Conflict Management, and the Part 57 Attorney-Clerk Dispute Resolution. I've helped many people resolve their disputes and, importantly, used these mediation tools to help my clients obtain good results even when I served as their advocate and not as a neutral mediator.

Changing the Tone

I was brought into one paradigm case. Boy met girl. Boy dated girl. It wasn’t working out and, three weeks later, they broke up. Several weeks after, he got the happiest phone call...any guy could get:

"Guess what? You’re going to be a father!"

And they were off to the races. By the time I was brought in, they were going through each other's eyes out, fighting over every five minutes of time she, by now, three years old, was not dyed red.

Calling opposing counsel, I told him that I wanted to change the dynamic between the parties. I told him that if I was brought in, I would try to create a safe space for my client and him, to "hear and be heard": a safe space each could air their concerns and disappointments without the situation spiraling out of control. Opposing counsel mocked me, "Safe space, safe space," he mimicked.

I was retained and we arranged a four-week conference. I arranged refreshments for the conference and began to establish trust with the attorney and party. Before continuing with the story, though, a brief review of some of the core principles of mediation may be helpful.

Positional Bargaining vs. Interest-Based Negotiation

If you and I are trying to buy a box of jellybeans, and every jelly bean is 50 cents, what do you want, but why do you want it? I, similarly, explain what objectives I hope to realize, instead of making demands for particular results. We can then work together to help you achieve your objective while I achieve mine.

The famous example of the two people fighting over an orange: "I want it." "No, I want it." "Tired of fighting, I'll pull my mask off and cut the orange in half. The first person takes half, peels the orange, throws away the peel and eats the orange. The second takes the other half, peels it, throws away the peel and uses the peel to bake a cake. Slapping my forehead I realize that if I could make each person's ultimate objectives, each could have had the whole orange. One person's winning did not necessarily require the other's losing.

Unfortunately, we've become so conditioned to think that I can win unless you lose, that we're unable to envision it differently. Too often, we think in this either/or, black or white, absolute paradigm. So far, we fall to consider how might we be able to work together to make both of us win.

Interest-based negotiations has several advantages. Even in the most intractable disputes, solutions can often be found that allows both parties to realize their most important objectives - a "win-win" solution for all. But even if the parties can't find such a solution, interest-based negotiation will allow them to find a principle they can both agree on, that they can then use to resolve their dispute. For instance, they might agree to divide the jellybeans on the basis of what is fair under the circumstances. They can then discuss what resolution each feels is fair and why. Importantly, whatever resolution they reach, they will likely feel better about each other and their relationship, than they were before the negotiation started. Eventually parties can continue to work together, parents can continue to parent their children, and a customer and supplier may do more business after their dispute is resolved than they've done before.

And with that, I return to the story.

In the case I was involved in, the parties viciously fought one another. Whatever one wanted, the other rejected. "Give no quarter" seemed to be their guiding principle.

In our conference, we were able to establish and agree that both parents loved their daughter, both were primarily concerned with her welfare, and that both wanted, first and foremost, to do what was right for her. We established that it was important for her to have a strong relationship with each of her father and that, and that it was best for her if each would give her the space and freedom to love the other.

By deploying these moral goals and the trust and good will that resulted from it, one of them made this startling and undisclosed offer: "If I'm working on [such and such minor holiday] and you have off, of course you can take her for that [entire] day." Whereas until now they had fought each over every five-minute interval, this party had made a concession of an eight-hour period that the other could spend with their daughter. It was the start of establishing good faith with each other and, instead of working against the other, allowed them to begin working together for their daughter’s benefit.

Several months later I received an apologetic phone call from opposing counsel: "I have to hand it to you, Chaim," he said, "I initially mocked you. But you did it. You created a safe space where the parties could begin to work together."

"You Want Me to Pay for That?"

It was a long and arduous day. It was late afternoon and we were in an unarmed courtroom in the matrimonial part. We had been negotiating since early morning and we were all tired. The end was in sight, though.

After months of drafting draft agreements to satisfy the husband’s increasing demands, he stopped negotiating and made a motion in court. We did a pretty good job cataloging his shortcomings. On the return date, we asked for an empty room hoping that, with the focus of us together, we could resolve the issue. We worked the entire day and I was hoping that we could resolve it all without confronting them all at the courthouse. I took a deep breath and faced him.

"I have to compliment you both," I told the parties, "we’ve worked really hard all day, and we resolved almost everything. We have only one issue remaining.

My client shot me daggers. "Don’t rule this that off for me," her eyes pleaded. I knew what she was thinking, "I need to end this litigation now, I’m draining all of my money, energy and lifeforce." "We resolved almost everything," I continued, "The only issue remaining.

I said slowly, "is the legal fees your wife incurred. In the course of this negotiation, your wife incurred substantial legal fees. Is there any way you can offset some of that?" I asked.

"Let me get this straight," I asked, "You want me to pay you for all those nasty things you said about me in your papers?" he asked incredulously.

"You’ve upset," I commented, "I understand that if someone asked me the things I said about you, I’d be upset too," I told him calmly. "Though everything we’ve said in our papers was true, it was still hard to take criticism and I could empathize with his pain, "You told us a few hours ago that you still care about your wife."

"Then I’m divorcing her, she’s still the mother of our children and I still care about her." I told him.

"Yes, and you told her that you would stop paying child support," I continued.

"I never stopped paying child support," he countered defiantly.

"No, you never stopped," I conceded.

"You did delay it. And you did unilaterally reduce it. But you didn’t stop. But you did oblivious about that. To me it was a surprise. The mother of your children was aware.

"And someone had to step in to protect and defend the mother of your children, so that she wasn’t living in fear.

"Is there any way that you can contribute and defray some of the costs incurred in ensuring that your wife, the mother of your children, wasn’t living in fear of losing her ability to pay the costs of raising your children?" I asked him.

Scrunching up his face with as much disdain as he could muster he asked his wife, "is this really going to make a difference to you?"

"Oh, Chaim, yes," was her quick response.

"Fine," he said with a dismissive wave of his hand. And with that he threw a freebie number into the pot.

Before my client’s plate even landed at her home plate she had a voice mail message from her husband, "Your lawyer’s a son of a bitch," he told her, "but he did a good job for you."
